

WORKING WITH RURAL POPULATIONS:

An ethical and cultural application to personal and professional practices

Instructors

Charline Bengtson, LMFT

Cassandra Brix, LMFT

Course Description

This intermediate level training starts with the basics of being able to define culture and recognizing basic ethical and cultural dilemmas that naturally arise in rural communities for a clinician in their personal and professional practices. Moving into the more complex relationship of working with and living amongst a diverse socioeconomic status population. This is a comprehensive and in-depth training that utilizes self-reflection, evaluation, personal and professional development, application of skills, and builds resources to work in and live your life in rural communities. Furthermore, participants will be given the opportunity to discuss difficult topics such as: cultural biases, dual relationships, use of pronouns in rural communities, identifying your own intersectionality in personal and professional practices, implicit biases and various other topics relating to culture and ethics in rural communities.
